

DON'T MISS OUT ON THIS FASCINATING AND RELEVANT COURSE!

In the second half of the twentieth century, Mexico, Argentina, Chile, and Brazil transitioned from semi-democratic regimes to democracy. Reforms included economic neo-liberal policies and abandoning of state-sponsored social programs. In these countries, social disparities deepened and uneven distribution of wealth increased. Political restructuring did not up-root long-standing governmental, political, and social maladies of corruption and marginalization for the many. New social and political actors emerged demanding change and active civic participation. In all, the transition is ongoing and unfulfilled.

In this course, you will study the democratization process in each of these countries and compare the similarities and differences. You will review the work of the BRINCO
